As part of the Let's Go Green festival, Halton Libraries are working with artist Rebecca Atherton to explore climate change in a unique and innovative way through a series of creative workshops for children.

Rebecca specialises in creating and constructing theatrical headdresses that represent mythological goddesses and animals.

In her workshops, Rebecca will delve into the effects of climate change and look at its impact on the animal kingdom. In the workshops, over a series of three sessions, children will design and create visually striking headdresses, depicting and celebrating great mythological animal spirits. Each headdress will be accompanied with its very own environmental pledge and will provoke discussion about how we can love our planet amongst wearers and viewers. Headdresses will then be displayed throughout Halton to inspire and generate discussion around this highly relevant and immediate environmental topic.

These workshops are perfect for children interested in art, animals and our natural world. It is a series of three workshops, with participants attending all three in order to deeply explore this topic and produce valuable creative pieces. Book on now for this unique opportunity to work closely with this acclaimed artist and to be part of our first Borough of Culture.
